B Signification

From a primitive sense 'to hold (in hand)', have has passed naturally into that of 'hold in possession,' 'possess,' and has thence been extended to express a more general class of relations of which 'possession' is one type, instead of which are very vague and intangible For just as the verbs be and do are the most generalized representatives of the verbal classes existing, being and action (actum) in Aristotle's classification of verbal predications (κατηγορίαι), so have is the most generalized representative of the class eyen (habitus, having) For although have in its primitive sense of 'hold' was a verb of action, in the sense 'possess, and still more, in the weakened senses 2, etc below, no notion of any action upon the object connected with it is predicated being merely a static relation between the subject and object. In the older languages this relation was often predicated not of the possessor but of the possessed, the former standing in the dative, thus Ic eat mihs liber, there is to me a book, I have a book. The extended use of have and its equivalents to express the auxiliary tenses is peculiar to the modern languages Like the two other generalized verbal types be and do, have also tends to use in which it becomes a mere element in the connected tenses of a predicative explanation apart from the context, and at length an auxiliary verb

General scheme of arrangement I As a main verb (trans or intr) To possess and connected uses  To keep in possession, hold, maintain, etc  To come into possession of, to get, and connected uses † Phrases  Idiomatic uses, had better, rather, etc II As an auxiliary verb III.  Idiomatic uses

22 The past Subjunctive had = would have, is used idiomatically with adjectives (or adverbs) in the comparative, as better, liefer, sooner, rather, in the superlative, as best, liefest, or in the positive with 'as', as good, as lief, as soon, as well, to express preference or comparative desirability

In the earliest form of these expressions, in OE the adjs léofre, betre were construed with be and the dative, e g him wǽre betere = it would be better for him In ME, side by side with this, appears have and the nominative in the sense 'he (I, etc) would hold or find it better or preferable' The use with the positive, and superlative, and the extension to rather are later, the use of as soon, sooner, well, is recent, since liefer and better began to be felt as adverbs (See exhaustive treatment by F Hall in Amer Jrnl Philol II 281) The following instances illustrate this idiom generally, fuller illustration will be found under the several words

II As an auxiliary verb As in the other Germanic (and Romanic) languages, the various moods and tenses of have are used with the pa pple of another verb, to form a series of compound or 'perfect' tenses of the latter, expressing action already finished at the time indicated, and answering to the Latin perfect tenses dedi, dederam, dedero, dedisse, etc

This use arose directly from sense 2 b, the object possessed having in agreement with it a passive participle of a transitive verb as attribute or complement, thus I have my work done—'I possess or have my work in a done or finished condition', whence, by inference of antecedent action from result, the actual sense 'I have done my work' cf the series have you the article ready?', 'have you the article completed?', 'have you completed the article?' In some dialects the distinction between the original and developed forms, e g 'He has the house built', 'he has built the house', is still in regular use, with some past participles, as begun, completed, done, finished, etc, it is recognized generally With transitive verbs the developed use was already frequent in OE, the pa pple, which originally agreed in number and case with the object, was sometimes left uninflected In early ME the usage is found with verbs of action without an object, whence it was extended to intransitive verbs, especially, at an early date, to the verb to be (as in French and other Romanic languages, and in opposition to continental Teutonic use), as he has been, had been, will have been, etc (cf F il a été Ger er ist gewesen) Verbs of motion and position long retained the earlier use of the auxiliary be, and he is gone is still used to express resulting state, while he has gone expresses action See BE 14 b

24 The present tense of have, forms a present of completed action, or 'present perfect' a To a trans. vb with object

He (hi, hĭ), pers pron, 3rd sing masc nom Forms see below [The simplest form of the (orig demonstr) base hi, which supplies not only the pronoun forms him, his, her, (h)it, (h)em, but also the adverbs here, hence, hither OE he, hē was cogn with OFris hi, he (fem hiu, neut hit, OS hi, he, hie The other old Teutonic langs (with OS in the oblique cases) have parallel forms from stem i- OHG ir, er, Goth is Fragments of a hi- stem, in sense 'this', are found, however, in Gothic, in dat himma, acc m and n hina, hita, they differ only in the initial h from the corresponding inflexions of is 'he' In OHG the East Franconian had also her in place of the usual OHG er, 'he' In English, the typical form in all ages has been he, from which emphasis probably produced heo, hye, hee, and tonelessness hĕ, ĕ, which last long prevailed in representations of familiar speech, as in the dramatists, and is still a prevalent dialect form In OE the base hi supplied all parts of the third personal pronoun, singular and plural, it was thus inflected

SING	MASC	FEM	NEUT	PLURAL
Nom	hi he	hio, héo hie, hi	hit	hi, hie, héo hig
Ac	hiene hine (hyne)	hie hi (héo)	hit	hi hie, heo hig
Dat	him (hym)	hiere hire (hyre)	him	him, heom (hym)
Gen	his (hys)	hiere hire (hyre)	his	hiera hira heora

1 In all the cognate languages, even in the early period, certain parts of the hi or i stem were lost, and supplied by the corresponding parts of the demonstrative base sa, a derivative of sā, SE This extended to English also in the 11th or 12th c when the fem hio, heo, became supplanted by the fem demonstrative sio, syo, which appears as sco, scho=sho in northern, and scæ—shæ in midl, now SHE, q v In the south and west heo (ho, hoo) survived in literature till the 15th c and is still native in the dialects in various forms, but she has been the only literary Eng form since the introduction of printing In the oblique cases HER remains

2 The original plural has been supplanted by a plural of the demonstrative that In the northern dial c 950, the OE þá, plural of þæt, was often used instead of hia, hi, within the next two centuries the equivalent ON þeir must have been adopted, as it appears c 1200 in full use in Orm as þeȝȝ whence the later they, thei thay that, which gradually spread south, and before 1500 superseded hi, hy, first in the nominative, and then also in the other cases, so that the plural forms are now they, them, their But a relic of the earlier pronoun survives, in southern dialect and colloquial use, in the dat accus hem, commonly written em

3 The original accusative forms have everywhere, except in the neuter, been replaced by an extended use of the dative this began in the midl dial before 1000, and was completed in the southern by 1350. In this change, the analogy of the 1st and 2nd persons was followed (see ME) Traces of the original acc sing masc hine remain as en, 'n (un), in southern dialects see HIN

4 In the neuter the acc hit remained, and also displaced the dative him, in all constructions hit lost its initial h between 12th and 15th c in Standard English, and in 16-17th c the original neuter genitive his was displaced first by it, and then by it's, its

5 The genitive cases his, hire, hira, (their), were treated after 1100, on the earlier analogy of mine thine, our your as adjectives, and inflected to agree with substantives, the plurals his-e, hir-e were still used by Wyclif Like the other possessives, they also developed two forms, an adjective and an absolute, the latter being hers, theirs (the -s of which was originally the possessive s), hisis was used by Wyclif, but in mod Eng his and its take no additional s in the absolute form Hisn, hern, theirn (perhaps by false analogy with my, mine) appear in 16th c in midl counties, but are now only dialectal The changes which these, originally genitives of the Personal Pronoun, have undergone, make it more convenient in modern grammar to treat them separately as Possessive Pronouns.

The present inflexion of this pronoun (with its derived possessives) is therefore

SING	MASC	FEM	NEUT	PLURAL

The following explanations and illustrations refer only to the nominative singular masculine HE, the other inflexional parts are treated separately, each in its alphabetical place So also the now colloq 'EM, formerly HEM 'them', the obs or dial HEO (hoo) 'she', HI 'they' HIN (dial en, un) 'him the ME HEMEN (dial min, mun) 'them', the early ME HISE 'her', and HISE 'them', and the dial HISN, HERN, THEIRN]

Notwithstanding a close consonant correspondence with L. caput, capit-, the difference of the root vowel makes it very difficult to identify the two words, or to refer them to a common root. Some refer the Teutonic word to an ablaut stem hauþ-, hauþ-, huþ-, whence OHG hiufan, Ger. hauche, OE. hupe, head covering, cap. The phonetic development of the word in Eng. has been hēafod, hēved, hevd, hed, hēd (hēd) hēd, hēd (hēd, hīd, hūd) In some dialects a diphthongal (hē·ad) has developed as (hi·ad, he·d, hyed, yed).]

-headed (hedid) suffix, later form of ME hǽde, hēd, found already in 12th c., but not known in OE, though pointing etymologically to an OE * hadit, -od cases hādi, -um, beside OE had masc., corresp to OHG -hat masc. and fem

The suffix was orig an independent subst (OTent hands = mod. at hand, in hand, in manus, way see HAND, HEDE), which, after coming to be used only in comb., was practically only a suffix of condition or quality. In its primary use, -hēd appears chiefly with appropriate adjs. in -feld, -lōc, -lēs, -rēde, -scrunkenhēde, -fairhēde, -fulshēde, etc; but it was soon extended to sbs., as in benghilhēde, manhēde, mægstadelhēde, mennishēde (all in Chaucer), and was used indiscriminately with -hād (-hede, -hood) from OE. -hād In Cursor M. Stalerhēde, fadirhede, prestishede, prestishod, occur as MS. variants Thus first the tendency to the obsolescence of -hēde, -hood, and the substitution, even in adjs., of -hood as more purely adjectival, -hēde as noun, etc. One or two special forms in -head = godhead, maidenhead (distinguished from godhood, maidenhood), only remain In heads, on the contrary, -hēde, -head, remained the current form, but is now more or less obsolescent See also HEAD sb., HEDE sb., and HOOD

The simple take hart (= pleasure, courage) is as old or older. The words heart of grace, when both written hert & hart in 16th c. Hence it has been surmised that take hart a grese or hart of grease, was orig. a punning or sportive expansion of take herte, after the earlier herte of grease, hart of grease, for hart (see HART 1 b), and that when the expression became proverbial, attempts were made to put sense into it by substituting grass and grace. Of course, heart of grace might be the original, and all the other forms popular corruptions of it, but it is not easy to explain grace in such a connexion: there is no corresponding +cause de grace. In any case, the number and variety of the forms show that the analysis was not clear even in the 16th c.]

In the origin and occasion of the name we are not clear. By the medieval herbalists the pansy and wallflower as well gilliflower (as well as the stock gilliflower and other plants) were included in their genus Viola. Of the 16th c. herbals Turner 1548 (51) has 'hearts ease' only as a name of the wallflower, Lyte in 1578, both of the wallflower (Viola lutea) and 'pances' (Viola tricolor). But Fuller 1650 applies it only to the pansy, and this appears to be the general usage from R. Greene onw ard

2 In Physics, formerly supposed to be an elastic material fluid (Caloric), of extreme subtility, attracted and absorbed by all bodies, now held to be a form of Energy, viz the kinetic and potential energy of the invisible molecules of bodies capable of being transmitted from one body to another, whether in contact (see Conduction 6, Convection) or separated (see Radiation) in the latter case, the energy during the transmission takes the form of (b) Radiant heat, which is not properly heat at all, but the energy of undulation of the intervening ether, being absorbed, within a certain range of wave-length, with light

Now viewed as the energy absorbed during the change of state, partly in increasing the molecular potential energy of the body and partly in compressing external bodies

3 spec In Physics, the heat required to raise the temperature of a given substance to a given extent (usually one degree), it is calculated relatively to some standard substance, usually water (see quot 1871), and forms a measure of the given substance's capacity for heat

a 1832 W J Macneven Inq Jeffersonian Syst (ed 2) I 645 2 The best series of experiments on the distribution of heat among different bodies was performed before the year 1784 by Professor Gadolin of Abo, who, reviving the notion of Capacity introduced the unexceptionable expression, Specific Heat 1844 Brande Dict Sci, etc, s v The term specific heat is applied to the quantity of thermometric heat required to raise different substances to the same temperature The specific heat of water being = 1, that of oil is 0 5 1863 Youmans Heat (1870) 23 As the specific heat increases, the atomic weight diminishes, and vice versa 1871 Maxwell The Heat in 66 The Specific Heat of a body is the ratio of the quantity of heat required to raise that body one degree to the quantity required to raise an equal weight of water one degree 1881 Nature No 607 15 Platinum has a specific heat of only 032

4 Atomic heat, molecular heat (Chem) = the product of the specific heat of a substance into its atomic or molecular weight see quots.

1870 Graham Elem Chem I 139 The atomic heat of bodies, as it is named by this chemist (M Regnault, 1841) is obtained by multiplying the observed specific heat of each body by its equivalent 1865–78 Watts Dict Chem III 37 Within certain classes of allied compounds the molecular heats of the substances or the products of their specific heats into their molecular weights are approximately equal As a rule, the molecular heat of solid compound bodies increases with the number of atoms contained in their molecule

b The ordinary name for undistributable of the Linnæan genus Erica, of which the common native species are E (now Calluna) vulgaris, common heath, heather, or ling E cinerea fine leaved heath (the 'common heath' of some parts), and E tetralix cross leaved heath By botanical writers sometimes limited to the modern genus Erica, sometimes extended to other cognate genera of Ericaceæ

The name heath seems native to the south and middle of England see HEATHER Since the 'common heath' is now separated from the genus Erica, botanical writers sometimes distinguish it from the 'true heaths' by its northern names LING and HEATHER, but locally all three names include all the native species. Of early botanical writers, Turner mentions only E vulgaris, Lyte (transl Dodoens), E vulgaris and E tetralix, distinguished as 'long heath and 'small heath'

As this word is used in all the Germanic langs. in the sense ‘non-Christian, pagan’, when it could only have arisen after the introduction of Christianity, it is thought probable that, like some other terms of Christian origin (e.g. church), it was first used in Gothic, and thence passed to the other tongues. This is supported by the use by Ulfilas in Mark vii. 6, of the fem. form haiþnō (Vulg. mulier cananea, all OE. versions hæðen). The word has generally been assumed to be a direct derivative of Goth. haiþi, heaþu, = ‘dweller on the heath’, taken as a kind of loose rendering of L. paganus rustic, villager, rustic, later after Christianity became the religion of the empire, = the pagan inhabitants were still retained in rural districts, ‘pagan, heathen’. But in this there are difficulties chronological and etymological, by reference to the form and use of the word, and Prof. S. Bugge (Indog. Forsch. V. 178) includes this among several words which point to Armenian influence on the language of the Goths. Arm. hanj was translating Gr. ἔθνος, the suffix was, as in erkn, erkin, is veiled under the ordinary in, en, from n. But even so, the stem vowel has probably to be explained by semi-Gothic haiþi = hanj.

A adj. 1 Applied to persons or races whose religion is neither Christian, Jewish, nor Mohammedan, pagan, Gentile. In earlier times applied also to Mohammedans, but in modern usage, for the most part, restricted to those holding polytheistic beliefs, or who uncivilized or uncultured

Heather (he·ðəɹ). Forms 4, 6 hathir, 5 had(d)yr, 6 haddir, hedder, 6-7 hadder, 6-8 hather, 8 hether, 8- heather. [Of uncertain origin, commonly viewed as related to heath, but the form heather appears first in 18th c., and the earlier hadder seems on several grounds to discountenance such a derivation. The word appears to have been originally confined to Scotland (with the contiguous part of the English Border), the northern Engl equivalent, as in Yorkshire, etc, is bunging, from Norse lyng. The word heath, on the other hand, seems to be native only in Southern and Mid land counties, and never to have been applied to the Yorkshire or Scottish 'heather', it is only in comparatively recent times that the southern English heath and the Sc. hadder, hedder, have been associated, and the spelling heather thence introduced. On the analogy of adder, bladder, ladder, now in Sc. ether, blether, lether, and of Eng. feather, together, weather, we should expect heather to go back through hidder, hadd-, to a type hrdder or hrddr-.]

Some recent botanical writers have essayed to limit the originally local name heath, heathe, to different species, but each of these names is in its own locality, applied to all the species there found, and pre emunently to the lowly moss almost un-der foot in Yorkshire and Scottish moors the most dund nt is E. vulgaris, which is therefore the 'Common Heath,' of the one the, Common Heather of the other. But in the Cheshire, Sop in the south west, E. cinerea is the prevalent species, and is there the 'Common Heath.' The West germanic formation of pt gave Goth hōbs ON and OE affected all parts of the present stem, exc 2nd and 3rd sing pres ind and sing imp, giving hebbe, hebbað, hebban, hebbende, beside hefst, hefp hefr In ME the bb forms were retained (in the south) till 14th c, but were at length everywhere reduced by levelling to f (later v) The pa t hafe came down as hafe, later ME this was hafde, usually displaced by a type haf, heaf, hōf, hēf, and another haf, have, both of which survived till 16th c The OL pa pple hafen was by the 12th c abandoned for hofen (later haven, hove), with o from the pa t, there are also traces of heven (cf OFris and Du) But, beside these strong inflexions, there appeared also in late OE (as in some of the dialects) weak inflexions hefde, hefed, these gained ground in ME, and esp in mod Eng, in which heaved is now the general form, though hove remains in certain uses The original sense, as evidenced by various derivatives, as well as by I capere, was 'take', whence, through 'take up', came that of 'lift, raise', already developed in OE and Goth

The close correspondence to I am is seen in comparing capio, capis, capit, capiunt with OEnut hebbe, hafast, hafap, hebbaþ OE habban, habe, habst, habbaþ, OF habbe, hafast, hafap, habbaþ Similarly heave is certainly cognate with aspire it must be originally quite distinct from have, if the latter is = I habere The two verbs however come close together in various forms in most of the langs, and their derivatives have probably influenced each other, so that it is difficult in some instances to know whether these belong to heave or to have]

'Day blindness', a visual defect in which the eyes see indistinctly, or not at all, by daylight but tolerably well by night or artificial light (But used by many in the sense of night blindness', Nyctalopia)

'Day blindness' is the etymological meaning of the word, and the sense in which it is used is the contrary of hemeralopia, was used by Galen But, as Nyctalopia was, from an early date, taken by some in the opposite sense, these all so reversed the etym logical sense of hemeralopia, and used it as 'night blindness', 'day sight', a if the word were hemeropia With the exception of Copland and Henry Power, all or most modern authors have used the term in the sense of night blindness The Royal College of Phy sicians of London have reverted to the true meaning of the word in their Nomenclature of Diseases (1901

So Ivat But the Medical Dictionary of J P Foster New York, 1890, continues the non etymological sense of day vision night blindness The word was rightly used by Paré in 1582 (Œuvres xv 3 Littré Le contraire est quand on voit mieux de nuit que de jour, et se peut dire hemeralopia en grec, et de chat en françois

The latinized hengestmannus in 1360, suggests immediate formation from OE hengest, but there is the difficulty that no trace of the latter appears after c 1205 (exc as an element of proper names, where OE Hengestes became Hinx, Hinks, Hinckes in accordance with the normal phonetic change of OF eng to later ing) On the other hand though hengest was also MLG, and henxt, heynst, henst the MDu forms, and Hans Wynsele in quot 1377 was evidently of 'Dutch' or German nativity, no example of the compound hengistman, or henxtman, is found in these languages. (Mod G hengstmann, 'groom of a stallion', is recent and technical) As to the original sense, the Promp Parv renders heyncemann by med L gerolocista, a contemporary L E glossary, Wr Wülcker 586/21, has 'gerolotista, sompturman' (cf also 582/11 'Falerarius, a sompterhors, falerator, a sompterman') Gerolocista (in Du Cange also gerulasista) was app a deriv of L gerulus 'carrier, porter', also 'sumpter horse' cf Promp Parv, 'Male horse [OF male, F malle trunk], gerulus, somarius', 'somer hors, gerulus, somarius, summarius' These equivalents seem to point to the sense 'attendant on a sumpter horse', perh the original meaning was simply 'attendant on a horse', 'groom', which might rise to be an honourable title, as in the current 'Groom in waiting', 'Groom of the-chamber' cf also the history of marshal, originally 'horse servant', 'groom' The 'hengestmanni, Mustard and Garleke', of 1360, the 'harlottez and hansemene' in Morte Arthur, and the 'henxmen and lackies' of P Holland (1 b), were apparently of the rank of ordinary grooms, but in connexion with the English court, the word came to connote a position of honour, and the royal henchmen of the 15–16th c were usually young men of rank In its historical sense, the word appears to have become obs by 1650 (see sense 1), for the modern use see sense 2 (See the discussion of this word in N & Q 7th s. II, III 8th s. III, etc, also Skeat, Student's Pastime, several articles)]

1 a ? A groom b A squire, or page of honour to a prince or great man, who walked or rode beside him in processions, progresses, marches, etc, also, one who, on occasion, fulfilled the same office to a queen or princess In later 16th c use, app = HENCH BOY Obs (exc Hist) since 17th c

Henry, Earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV, had in his retinue, in his Expedition to Prussia and Palestine 1392–3, 'two henxmen', to whom there are many references in the Accounts (edited by Miss L. Toulmin Smith for Camd Soc), cited in quot 1392 In 1402, two henxtmen accompanied Henry's daughter Blaunche from Cologne to the parts of Almaine, whither she went as a bride From the 14th cent, henxmen or henchmen formed part of the regular household or suite of English kings and queens, their number rising from three under Henry VI to seven under Edward IV and Richard III, under the command of the Master of the Horse At the coronation of Richard III in 1483, his queen had also five henchmen riding on 'womens sadelles' In 15–16th c nobles and knights also had their henchmen, usually three. The royal henchmen or 'chyldren of honor' were abolished by Queen Elizabeth in 1565 (see quot), and the word, though still frequent in transferred and analogical uses c 1600, app became obs. in English use by 1650 (Cf also HENCH BOY, which continued in practical use to c 1675)

2 The personal attendant, 'right-hand man', or chief gillie of a Highland chief, hence, generally, a trusty follower or attendant who stands by the side of his chief or leader, and supports him in every case of need

This sense begins app with Burt who spells hanchman and explains it as derived from hanch, i e HAUNCH, hence Scott (who edited Burt) has hanchman in Waverley, but elsewhere, in the same sense, uses henchman, thus identifying Burt's and his own 'hanchman' with the obsolete Eng 'henchman' the rest of the world has taken the word from Scott It does not appear whence or how Burt got the word there is no term corresponding to 'haunch man' in Gaelic (Burt himself, a few sentences on, calls the same individual simply gilly), and it is uncertain whether he himself invented the term, or really found the obs Eng henchman retained in a modified sense in some part of the Highlands. In any case, association between henchman and haunchman was very natural haunch in Scotch is pronounced hainch, hench (see HAUNCH sb [1], v [3]) 'haunch man', if it existed, would be pronounced hainchman or henchman, and the Eng 'henchman', if in any way known, would be there naturally taken as 'man at the hench or haunch'

16 Here- in combination with adverbs and prepositions

[These originated, as in the other Teutonic langs, in the juxtaposition of her and another adv qualifying the same verb Thus in HEREBEFORE 1st quot hér beforan = here (in this document), before (i e at an earlier place) Cf hereinbefore, hereinafter in which herein is similarly used But as many advs were identical in form with prepositions, and there was little or no practical difference between 'here, at an earlier place and 'before or at an earlier place than this, the adv came to be felt as a prep governing here (= this place), and, on the analogy of this, new combinations were freely formed of here (there, where) with prepositions which had never been adverbs, as herefor, hereto, hereon, herewith]

a with adverbs as here above, here beneath, here within, here without, hereforth, forward in this direction or this way, here next, next to this, immediately after this Also HEREAWAY, HEREUNDER, etc b with prepositions = this, this place, this matter, etc as hereabove, here-among, here beside, hereinto, here within, here-without, † here-afore = HEREBEFORE, † hereintil (Sc), herein, † hermid, herewith, † hereover, in addition to this, † hertoȝeines, against this, on the other hand Also HEREABOUT, HEREWITH, etc, etc
